and surface syntactic structure: deep structure (an abstract underlying structure of a sentence) and surface (outward form of a sentence).

Topic-064: Usage-based School

The usage-based theory of language acquisition claims that language structure emerges from its use. Tomasello (2003) proposed the theory with emphasis on the usage of the language based on the cognitive skills. Lieven and Tomasello, (2008, p. 168) believe that 'the child learns language from actual 'usage events', i.e., from particular utterances in particular contexts, and builds up increasingly complex and abstract representations from these.' Two key components of usage based approach are: meaning in use which refers to the semantic aspect of linguistic communication and structure emerges from use which considers the grammatical aspect of linguistic communication.

Intention-reading and pattern-finding are two sets of cognitive skills proposed by Tomasello that reinforce usage-based theory. Tomasello (2003) describes:

'Intention-reading' is what children must do to determine the goals or intentions of mature speakers when they use linguistic conventions to achieve social ends, and thereby to learn these conventions from them culturally in accordance with the functional approach mentioned above. 'Pattern-finding' is what children must do in order to extract abstract linguistic schemas or constructions from the individual utterances in accordance with the grammatical approach mentioned above. Therefore, this
